A Reflection of Societal and Cultural Constructs of Chapman University: University Workers

The Chapman student: boasting a private school education on a campus surrounded by excess. But... who maintains us and our surroundings? The workers at Chapman play the roll of "speak when spoken to" throughout their work hours, but I was curious to know more about them. And I wondered if they might be curious about me, as a student. I began a relationship with the workers by taking their photograph (an often intimate act). Then I asked them to write down how they perceived me: how I acted, looked and how (or if) my attitude had an effect on them. I, in turn, noted their attitudes and reflections as they interacted with me. Come see the portraits, paired with the workers' handwritten reflections, and learn more about the experience.
