In Esther Stern’s testimony, she mentioned how she and her two younger sisters had to march in horrible, freezing weather conditions without any warm clothes. They were able to sustain their humanity through this trek by holding each other close for warmth. In this piece, I wanted to emphasize the warmth and strength they shared through their family connection, which allowed them to persevere through the death march and all the terrible events of the Holocaust they endured. My family’s presence and support sustain me now during the worldwide pandemic.
